My peers, my friends, my fellow Seniors:

This is becoming increasingly difficult. (INSERT INSPIRATIONAL MUSIC HERE). However, I have never turned down an opportunity to speak to you all, and gosh darnit! I'm not going to start now… My only regret is that I am not taking up class time.

The day is Monday, September 19 of the year 2007. Since I am writing this months prior to your reading it, I am unable to reflect on the year as a whole. However, I have devised a method so that I, with you're help, may give the perfect farewell address…in the style of Mad Libs.

For those of you who have never played Mad Libs before, simply name the part of speech and have your friends blurt out a word that fits. Then put it in the blank, and read. Enjoy.

First off, let me begin by saying: what a/n [adjective] Year! We've come so far together, and from many different places, like [noun], [noun], and not to mention, [noun]. We've [verb, past tense] in the corner during intruder alerts, been [verb, past tense] in Health class, [verb, past tense] competition day, survived [noun] at Prom, [verb, past tense] overseas with the natives, and watched the emo-revolution [verb] the school.

At last, we have finally graduated this [adjective] school, and now we all [adverb] depart this [adjective] town of Westborough. Sure, we'll miss the [noun], and maybe even the [noun], but we will never forget the [adjective] sound of that [adjective] bell. It's been almost 700 days, and it's finally time to [verb] into the real world.

We'll miss our [adjective] friends, and the way they use to [adverb] lend a [adjective] hand. We cannot of course forget our [adjective] teachers; their [adjective] words have always put a bright [noun] on our faces and filled our head with [noun]. The laughs, the [plural nouns], and the [plural nouns] have been [adjective].

So, [verb] yourself a great big [noun] on the back. You've [verb, past tense] it.

Wishing you the most [adjective] of luck,

Evan Sigel, Senior Class President

So this is what people get to remember me by, no more than 477 characters. I guess this is a big deal. I mean if I dont write something deep and meaningful I will look like a loser to the future midlife crisis generation of WHS. Maybe I should write a shoutout to all my senior friends like Jake, Sam, Annie, and Lisa. Now for a quote: "Take the blue pill, the story ends... I think the purpose of our education is to teach how to learn. It's not really about the material; what we learn here usually does not retain into next period. So then, what have I actually learned here? How to love and inspire, how to overcome hurt and suffering, how to grow and lead. Looking back at these past four years, I know that what I have learned here will last me a lifetime. Thank you to my family and friends, who support and accept me as who I am. Good Luck 2008!

I don't want 15 minutes of fame. I want a life, I want to choose the best. I know the best are selectively chosen. I don't want to work for a company, I want to build one. But the rest of my goals are long term. The results of my day-to-day determination. I redefine the word consistency. Along the way there will be moments of brilliance. I am sure the moments will add up to something greater. A record of excellence. A plaque in the hall. I hope to be remembered, not just recalled.

It has been my honor to serve as your Principal. I am grateful for the opportunity to get to know you albeit only for one year. You have proven yourselves to be a great class. Your commitment to your school and your peers is exemplary.

As you leave the hallowed halls of Westborough High School, reflect upon all your accomplishments and be sure to take the time to thank all of those who have helped you get to where you are. Take the lessons you have learned and use them to create a rich and fulfilling life for yourself. Challenge yourself to always do what is right and serve your communities. I wish all of you the very best.

Sincerely,
John G. Smith
Principal

"The train began to move, and Harry walked alongside it, watching his son's thin face, already ablaze with excitement. Harry kept smiling and waving, even though it was like a little bereavement, watching his son glide away from him...

The last trace of steam evaporated in the autumn air. The train rounded a corner. Harry's hand was still raised in farewell.

"He'll be all right," murmered Ginny.

"I know he will." All was well." -DH
